

INFJ: (Introverted-iNtuitive-Feeling-Judging)

- Are kind, considerate, conscientious, organized, and decisive in being of service to the individuals and institutions that they are committed to.
- Are among the most cooperative of all types. Some INFJs may appear to lack competitive drive, but this is usually not the case. INFJs' drive is to be helpful to others. Directly competing against others is not in their nature. If parents, teachers, or coaches do not understand this, INFJs may get the message that the way they are naturally wired is not okay. This situation can be quite confusing for them. Simply by being themselves, they find they are disappointing the very individuals they are naturally wired to help.
- Focus their energy on causes that prioritize the needs of other human beings. INFJs have a natural drive to understand what motivates people and to help them accomplish their goals. They see the ability in others and know how to help them realize it. This quality translates into outstanding individual and group counselors.
- Are reserved and can be hard to get to know. INFJs are usually devoted to spouse and children but may not, with any regularity, be open to physical demonstrations of affection. An NF partner, in particular, may misinterpret this natural discomfort, as intentionally rejecting behavior,
- Like all NF personality types they are sensitive to the tone and directness of communication and can feel hurt & rejected by comments not intended to hurt.
- Are super-conscientious.
- Have personal warmth and genuine enthusiasm.
- Are insightful and have original minds.
- Cooperative nature can be deceptive. INFJs have a strong independence of mind. A sense of knowing what is that they will not usually impose on others.

- Can concentrate in depth and tend to be well organized. This usually translates into success in whatever they decide to do.
- Must have harmony in their lives; conflict is destructive to their psyches.
- Take their commitments to spouse and children seriously and are ultra reliable.
- The level of attentive awareness and nurturing in their connection to their children is such that they can have difficulty adjusting as their children naturally separate from them during the teen years.
